BEFORE YOU LAND

10 THINGS TRANSFERS MISS

Handle these before your Hawaii relocation

INTRODUCTION

Why some transfers land settled and some land scrambling

Every month, people land in Hawaii on orders or an offer letter. Same flight, same island, same timeline pressure. But their first 30 days look completely different.

Some spend that month settling in: kids enrolled, car on the way, housing locked, commute understood. Others spend it in a hotel room fighting fires that were completely predictable, waiting on a car that shipped too late, discovering the school deadline passed, or learning their housing budget was built on mainland math.

The difference is never luck, rank, or salary. It's what got handled before wheels down. These are the 10 things that transfers consistently say they wish they'd handled from the mainland, while everything was still a phone call instead of a crisis.

HOW TO USE THIS

You don't have time for homework projects, so every item here is built as a single action with a deadline attached. Go through the list, mark what's done, and calendar the rest. Most items take under an hour. All of them are cheaper, faster, and easier before you land.

THE 10 THINGS TO CHECK

☐ 1. SHIP THE CAR EARLIER THAN FEELS NECESSARY

Vehicle shipping to Hawaii takes weeks, and rental cars on your timeline get expensive fast. Transfers who waited "until things firmed up" spent their first month paying rental rates that ate their relocation budget.

How to handle: Book car shipping the moment your report date is confirmed, and price a rental for the gap so it's a plan, not a surprise.

☐ 2. START THE PET PROCESS THE SAME WEEK YOU GET ORDERS

Hawaii is rabies-free and the entry requirements are strict. Qualifying for direct release takes months of preparation, not weeks. Families who started late faced quarantine, stress, and costs nobody warned them about.

How to handle: Read Hawaii's animal entry requirements today and work backwards from your fly date. This is the single most time-sensitive item on this list.

3. RUN THE HOUSING BUDGET ON HAWAII MATH

Whether you're using BAH or a corporate housing stipend, the number that felt generous on paper meets a different market here. Transfers who house-hunted with mainland expectations lost weeks adjusting.

How to handle: Browse current listings in your real budget before you land, so your expectations and the market meet before your family does.

4. PICK THE COMMUTE FIRST, THEN THE NEIGHBORHOOD

The affordable area 20 miles from base or the office can mean an hour-plus each way on an island with no alternate freeway. Commute regret is one of the most common reasons transfers move twice in their first tour.

How to handle: Map the drive from any neighborhood you're considering to your duty station or office at 7am, not midday.

5. KNOW THE SCHOOL ENROLLMENT DEADLINES BEFORE CHOOSING HOUSING

Your address decides the public school, and enrollment windows, records requests, and sports eligibility all run on deadlines that don't care about your report date.

How to handle: Look up the school tied to each neighborhood on your shortlist and confirm what enrollment requires, before signing a lease.

6. LINE UP TEMPORARY HOUSING WITH AN EXIT PLAN

Most transfers need a bridge between landing and permanent housing. The mistake isn't booking temporary housing, it's booking it open-ended, with no search plan, which is how two weeks becomes two months.

How to handle: Book your temporary housing with a target end date, and start your rental search 60 to 90 days before arrival so the bridge stays a bridge.

7. BUDGET THE ARRIVAL GAP, NOT JUST THE MOVE

The first 90 days come with costs the moving estimate never mentions: deposits, a second set of household basics while the container floats, higher grocery prices, and replacing whatever didn't make the cut.

How to handle: Set aside a dedicated arrival fund on top of your moving costs, and treat it as spent before you land.

8. GET THE PAPERWORK SEQUENCE IN ORDER

Driver's license, vehicle registration, safety check, insurance updates. Hawaii has its own sequence and its own rules, and doing them out of order means repeat trips and lost half-days.

How to handle: List the licensing and registration steps for your county now, with required documents, so your first week is one trip, not four.

9. CONFIRM HEALTHCARE ACCESS BEFORE YOU NEED IT

Provider networks, new patient waits, and specialty access all vary by island. Transfers with kids or ongoing care needs who waited until arrival spent months getting established.

How to handle: Confirm your insurance works the way you think it does here, and find a primary care provider or pediatrician accepting new patients near your target area.

10. LEARN THE PLACE, NOT JUST THE LOGISTICS

Hawaii has a culture with deep roots and unwritten rules about respect, patience, and community. Transfers who showed up curious and humble built a network fast. The ones who treated it like any other duty station stayed outsiders.

How to handle: Spend a few hours learning local customs and etiquette before you land, and commit to one community connection in your first month, on base or off.

WHAT TO DO NEXT

Ten items. Most take under an hour.

Look at what's still unmarked on your list. That's not a wall of problems, it's a week of phone calls and browser tabs, and every single one gets harder the day you land. The transfers who had the smooth first month didn't have more time than you. They just spent an hour a day on this list while the mainland still made it easy.

Start with the clock-driven items first: pets, car, school deadlines. Those three punish delay the most. Everything else can flex.

If you want a local shortcut, bring this list to a free call with us.
